

Swimming with the Salmon

As i was walking by the river

I suddenly saw a shoal of salmon jumping out in front of me.

They leaped and bounded like flashes of light.

They came up to me and said hi.

Hi I replied. They told me they were celebrating

The birth of their new-borns.

Were on their way to a party, and would I come along.

Gladly I said, and jumped into the river.

Upon hitting the water I turned into a salmon.

I swam in the midst of the shoal,

Singing with them their tuneful song.

We looked like flashes of lightning

For our glittery bodies went so fast through the water.

Soon we reached the sea and formed a party in a cave.

The babies next to their mummies, being fondly watched

Then I thought I saw you, but you were a fish too.

You came up to me, I said you remind me of someone.

You said I love you, I said I love him too.

You who was not you, he appeared not to understand,

And took me in his arms.

Then the champagne corks popped,

Which the babies caught, in the stream of liquid, laughing.

and we all stood in a circle, and danced,

And with his fins, he threw me up in the air, and caught me,
